Monetary policy meetings of the Fed, ECB and CBRT were high on the agenda last week. Fed and ECB decided at the last meetings of the year to maintain their current policy stance. Optimistic expectations for the trade agreement supported global markets in general and election results in the UK reduced Brexit uncertainty leading to a rapid appreciation of the pound. CBRT cut the policy rate from 14% to 12%. While CBRT's monetary policy remains accommodative, economic activity continued to provide mixed signals. Industrial production increased below expectations in October, while retail sales rose strongly in the same period. Weak employment outlook persisted also in September.

Agreement on the phase one trade deal...

Last week, optimistic expectations regarding the trade deal led markets. Trump's announcement that they were "very close to a deal" and the hints that additional tariffs against China would not take effect boosted global risk appetite. On Friday, both parties announced the agreement on the phase one trade deal, yet they did not provide all the details and when the signing will take place remained uncertain. Along with these statements, US equity markets reached new record high levels last week, while emerging market equities recorded rapid increases.

Fed officials do not expect a change in the policy rate in 2020.

At its last monetary policy meeting of the year, the Fed left the policy rate at 1.50-1.75% in line with expectations. Fed officials' macroeconomic projections for 2020 were closely monitored. While no revision was made to the growth and inflation forecasts, the "dot plot" revealed that 13 out of 17 Fed members predicted that the policy rate would remain at the current level next year. 4 members estimated a 25 bp increase. This outlook supports the views that the Fed may choose to remain on hold ahead of the US presidential election in November 2020.

The first monetary policy meeting of Lagarde as ECB President...

In its first meeting chaired by Christine Lagarde, ECB did not change interest rates. As the statement released after the meeting was almost the same with the previous meeting was interpreted as the new president will maintain the current monetary policy stance. ECB's macroeconomic projections did not show a significant change. ECB predicts that the Euro Area economy will grow by 1.1% in 2020, after expanding by 1.2% in 2019, and forecasts that inflation will end 2019 and 2020 at 1.2% and 1.1%, respectively.

Conservative Party's landslide victory at UK election...

At the UK election held on 12 December, the Conservative Party, led by Prime Minister Boris Johnson, won 365 of the seats and exceeded 326, which was necessary for an outright majority. As the Conservative Party, which promised to fulfill Brexit, won the election by a landslide, the uncertainties diminished, while the pound recorded a rapid appreciation. The GBP/USD parity reached its highest level since May 2018 at 1.3514 during the intraday trading on December 13.

CBRT lowered the policy rate by 200 basis points more to 12%.
